Further research showed that students with low self-esteem, who were also the poorest, had the lowest scores on the self-esteem scale. This suggests that students with low self-esteem are also the most at risk of dropping out of school. The researchers also found that students with low self-esteem were more likely to be absent from school and to have lower grades than students with high self-esteem. These findings suggest that self-esteem is an important factor in student success and that interventions to improve self-esteem may be beneficial for students at risk of dropping out of school.
