Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported depression among a sample of young adults in the United States and to examine the association between self-reported depression and self-reported health status, self-reported stress, and self-reported life satisfaction.

Methods: Data were obtained from the 2004 National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health, a nationally representative sample of adolescents and young adults in the United States. The study included 10,122 participants aged 18 to 24 years. The prevalence of self-reported depression was determined using a validated self-report measure. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported health status, self-reported stress, and self-reported life satisfaction was examined using logistic regression.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported depression was 11.1%. Self-reported depression was associated with self-reported health status, self-reported stress, and self-reported life satisfaction. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported health status was stronger for females than for males. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported stress was stronger for males than for females. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported life satisfaction was stronger for females than for males.

Conclusion: Self-reported depression is a common condition among young adults in the United States. Self-reported depression is associated with self-reported health status, self-reported stress, and self-reported life satisfaction. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported health status is stronger for females than for males. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported stress is stronger for males than for females. The association between self-reported depression and self-reported life satisfaction is stronger for females than for males.
