

Qu'est-ce que la maladie de Parkinson ?

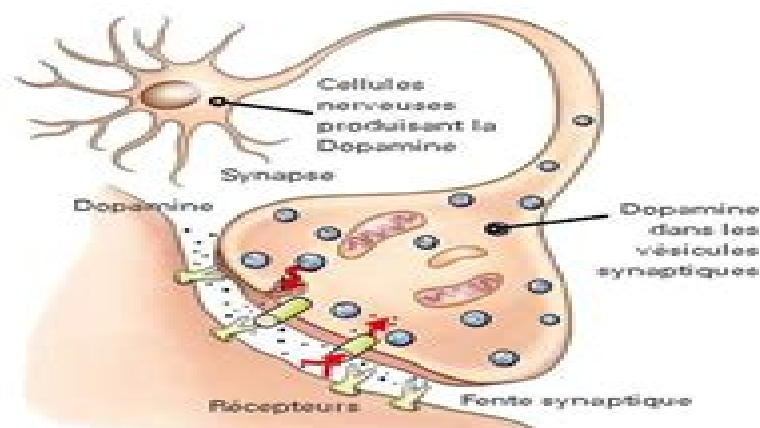

D'OÙ VIENT LA MALADIE ?

La maladie de Parkinson est une maladie du système nerveux qui se caractérise par le vieillissement précoce et la mort de cellules nerveuses (neurones). C'est principalement la « substance noire » (une structure de couleur foncée dans la zone centrale du cerveau) qui est atteinte. Elle contient des cellules nerveuses qui produisent et sécrètent la dopamine, un neurotransmetteur.

Les neurotransmetteurs tels que la dopamine sont des messagers chimiques indispensables pour transmettre les informations entre les différentes cellules nerveuses qui contrôlent certaines fonctions du corps humain. Au niveau de la jonction entre deux neurones, appelée « synapse », il y a un mince espace que les signaux électriques responsables du transport de l'information au sein des cellules ne peuvent pas traverser. Les neurotransmetteurs prennent alors le relais et transportent l'information à travers la fente synaptique.

La dopamine contrôle notamment la motricité : les mouvements volontaires et réflexes des bras, des jambes et d'autres parties du corps. La coordination des mouvements est perturbée lorsque les cellules nerveuses qui libèrent la dopamine meurent. Les commandes pour les mouvements ne sont plus transmises correctement et, plus le nombre de neurones intacts diminue, plus la motricité est perturbée.

On sait depuis quelques années que la maladie de Parkinson affecte également d'autres zones du cerveau, c'est pourquoi des troubles peuvent également se présenter dans d'autres parties de l'organisme. Même le système digestif et le réseau complexe de cellules nerveuses qui y est associé peuvent être affectés.

FAITS ET CHIFFRES
