Abstract. Staphylococcus aureus is a Gram positive organism, which is ubiquitous in nature, and which can cause opportunistic infections in humans, animals, and plants. It is a common pathogen in humans, and is responsible for a wide range of infections, including skin infections, abscesses, and food poisoning. It is also a common cause of hospital-acquired infections, and is a major cause of antibiotic resistance. The purpose of this study was to investigate the prevalence of S. aureus in the environment, and to determine the factors associated with its presence. The study was conducted in a hospital setting, and involved the collection of samples from various sources, including the air, surfaces, and patients. The results of the study showed that S. aureus was present in all of the samples collected, and that the highest prevalence was found in the air. The study also found that the presence of S. aureus was associated with the use of antibiotics, and with the presence of other pathogens. The results of this study suggest that S. aureus is a common and important pathogen, and that its presence in the environment should be monitored and controlled.
