

ETHNIC AND RACE

ETHNICITY, RACE, AND ANTHROPOLOGY: THE ETHNIC TURN

1. Ethnicity and Race: Definitions and Distinctions

While race identity is often based on physical characteristics, ethnicity is based on cultural practices, language, and shared history. Ethnicity is a social construct, while race is often seen as a biological category.

The concept of ethnicity is complex and multifaceted, often used to describe groups of people who share a common cultural heritage. Ethnicity is often defined by shared language, customs, and traditions. It is a social construct, meaning it is created and maintained by society. Race, on the other hand, is often defined by physical characteristics such as skin color, hair color, and eye color. It is often seen as a biological category, although it is also a social construct.

In anthropology, the study of ethnicity and race is often referred to as the "ethnic turn." This turn emerged in the 1980s and 1990s, as anthropologists began to focus more on the cultural and social aspects of ethnicity and race, rather than just the biological aspects.

2. The Ethnic Turn in Anthropology

The ethnic turn in anthropology was a response to the limitations of previous approaches to the study of ethnicity and race. Anthropologists began to focus more on the cultural and social aspects of ethnicity and race, rather than just the biological aspects. This turn was influenced by a number of factors, including the work of scholars like Clifford Geertz and Fredrik Barth. Geertz's concept of "thick description" emphasized the importance of understanding the cultural context of social actions. Barth's work on ethnic boundaries emphasized the role of social processes in the creation and maintenance of ethnic groups. The ethnic turn also reflected a growing awareness of the importance of ethnicity and race in contemporary society. Anthropologists began to see ethnicity and race as central to understanding human social organization and behavior.
