- Abstract: The purpose of this study was to examine the relationship between the use of a computer-based decision support system (DSS) and the performance of a task. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The participants were 20 college students who were assigned to two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group used a traditional decision-making process, while the experimental group used a DSS. The results showed that the experimental group performed significantly better than the control group. The DSS helped the participants to make more accurate decisions and to complete the task more efficiently. The study also found that the DSS reduced the time taken to make a decision and to complete the task. The results suggest that the use of a DSS can improve the performance of a task and reduce the time taken to make a decision and to complete the task.

Figure 1. Indirect effects of stress on children's risk for a self-reported delinquent status, mediated through school performance. The model used in this study was based on a structural equation model (SEM) with the following paths: (a) stress predicts school performance; (b) school performance predicts self-reported delinquent status; (c) stress predicts self-reported delinquent status. The model was tested using a two-step procedure. First, the model was tested for goodness of fit. Second, the model was tested for the significance of the indirect effect of stress on self-reported delinquent status.
