

Pyramid of Energy Packet

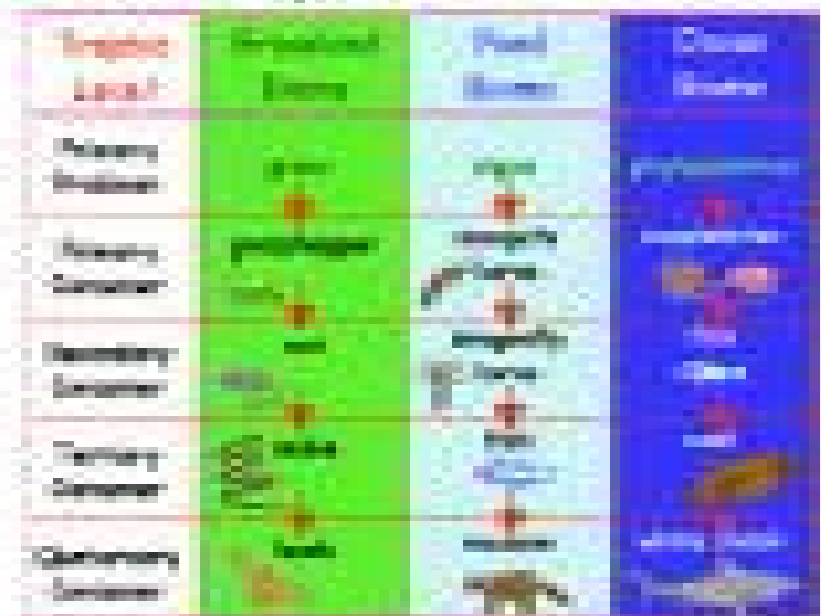

Very important to the understanding of the energy flow through the ecosystem is the concept of energy packets, also called trophic levels, which are defined as follows:

1st level: Autotrophic organisms that have the ability to synthesize organic compounds from inorganic substances (from the atmosphere and from the soil) using a special group of microorganisms (cyanobacteria). These autotrophic organisms are the basis for the development of many ecosystems. For example, in the oceans, the autotrophic organisms are the cyanobacteria, which are the basis for the development of many marine ecosystems. In the forests, the autotrophic organisms are the trees, which are the basis for the development of many terrestrial ecosystems.

2nd level: Organisms that feed on the autotrophic organisms, such as herbivores. These organisms are the basis for the development of many ecosystems. For example, in the oceans, the herbivores are the zooplankton, which are the basis for the development of many marine ecosystems. In the forests, the herbivores are the deer, which are the basis for the development of many terrestrial ecosystems.
