

It had been two years — two auditions — since I last successfully auditioned into the highly esteemed Delaware All-State Orchestra. For the past two years, I failed to be a part of the violin section of the orchestra; ~~and~~ at the auditions, I was simply too nervous to audition well. And so, this year I resolved to forget the past — but learn from it — and get into All-State Orchestra.

I have been playing the violin for the past eight years, and so it can be said that I am a talented violinist. However, I am easily prone to being nervous at auditions; this year, I knew I had to work on my relaxation skills. But everytime I practiced this, memories of my past two failures entered my mind and it became difficult to concentrate. I forced myself to move the past out of my mind and to only hold on to the lessons I learned from it. Gradually, practicing the new audition piece became easier and less stressful.

I remember the days after I found out <sup>my</sup> failure to get into All-State in the previous two years. My father would constantly say, "You simply didn't practice hard enough. If you practiced harder, you wouldn't have been nervous." I knew this was true, but the way my father said it to me upset me and I would tell him so. These arguments, part of my dreadful past, now made me even more determined to do well in this year's All-State auditions; if I <sup>successfully</sup> auditioned into the orchestra, I would never have to hear my father and I argue again.

I also recollect my loss of the love for playing the violin. My failures hindered my true emotions when I played Bach's Sonatas or Mozart's concertos. My hands would shake out of the anger that I felt about my past two failures. My resolution to get into All-State this year would make me ~~forget to~~ work harder, for I knew I should not be feeling emotionless while playing such beautiful music.

~~But~~ In the end, I finally ~~did~~ get into All-State this year. The horrible memories of the past, as I saw, were the forces that drove me to my climbing of the ladder to success.
