Information for general practitioners and other health care workers

1. Aetiology

Human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) is the aetiological agent of AIDS. It is a member of the retrovirus family, which includes the human immunodeficiency virus type 1 (HIV-1) and HIV-2. HIV-1 is the most common cause of AIDS, while HIV-2 is found in West Africa and the Caribbean.

HIV-1 is transmitted through sexual contact, blood transfusion, and sharing of needles. HIV-2 is transmitted through sexual contact and blood transfusion. HIV-1 is also transmitted through breast milk.

The virus enters the body through a break in the skin or mucous membranes. Once inside, it attacks the immune system, specifically the CD4+ T lymphocytes, which are essential for fighting off infections.

As the number of CD4+ T lymphocytes decreases, the body's ability to fight off infections is weakened. This leads to the development of opportunistic infections, which are infections that take advantage of the weakened immune system.

Common opportunistic infections include Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia (PCP), Kaposi's sarcoma, and toxoplasmosis. These infections are often fatal if not treated.

The progression of HIV infection to AIDS is a gradual process. It typically takes several years for the immune system to become severely weakened. The average time from infection to the development of AIDS is about 10 years.

There is no cure for HIV infection, but antiretroviral therapy (ART) can significantly reduce the viral load and slow down the progression of the disease. ART can also reduce the risk of transmitting the virus to others.

Prevention of HIV infection is the key to reducing the burden of AIDS. This can be achieved through safe sexual practices, such as using condoms, and avoiding sharing needles. Blood transfusion with screened blood is also a safe practice.

For more information on HIV and AIDS, please contact your local health department or the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC).
