The purpose of this study was to determine if the existing literature on the effectiveness of the various types of interventions and the results of the studies in the field of the study were consistent with the findings of the study in the field of the study.

The 1990s brought serious reflection about the value of the existing institutions, and the 2000s brought a fundamental shift that put the focus on governance processes and institutional effectiveness. The combination of the demand for greater and more robust protection of the environment, and the growing realization that the environment is a public good, has been a powerful impetus for the development of the environmental governance movement.
