1. Identify the independent and dependent variables. The independent variable is the amount of time spent studying, and the dependent variable is the score on the exam.
2. Formulate a hypothesis. A hypothesis is a statement that predicts the relationship between the independent and dependent variables. For example, "Students who study for more than 10 hours will score higher on the exam than students who study for less than 10 hours."
3. Design the study. This involves determining the sample size, the data collection method, and the statistical analysis to be used. In this case, the sample size would be the number of students, the data collection method would be a survey or test, and the statistical analysis would be a comparison of scores.
4. Collect and analyze data. This involves gathering data from the sample and using statistical methods to analyze it. In this case, the data would be the scores on the exam, and the statistical methods would be used to compare the scores of students who studied for different amounts of time.
5. Draw conclusions. This involves interpreting the results of the study and making a decision about whether the hypothesis is supported or not. In this case, the conclusion would be based on whether the scores of students who studied for more than 10 hours were significantly higher than the scores of students who studied for less than 10 hours.

- a. The first step is to identify the variables in the model. In this case, the variables are the number of hours worked per week (X) and the number of hours per week that the individual is unemployed (Y).
- b. The second step is to identify the relationship between the variables. In this case, the relationship is that the number of hours worked per week is inversely related to the number of hours per week that the individual is unemployed.
- c. The third step is to identify the data source. In this case, the data source is the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which provides data on the number of hours worked per week and the number of hours per week that the individual is unemployed.
- d. The fourth step is to identify the statistical method to be used. In this case, the statistical method is linear regression, which is used to estimate the relationship between the variables.
