CHARLES DEMPSEY

I. AN OVERVIEW OF FIELD RESPONSES

The management of a mental health crisis begins in the field and can either escalate or de-escalate based on the management of the crisis by first responders, which is influenced by the training those first responders received. Law enforcement has known for a long time that there has been a paradigm shift in which law enforcement has become the first responders and the gatekeepers to mental health services. This shift is exemplified by the below excerpt from the Los Angeles Police Department ("LAPD") Manual:

In police contacts with persons suffering from a mental illness, the goal of the Department is to provide a humane, cooperative, compassionate and effective law enforcement response to persons within our community who are afflicted with mental illness. The Department seeks to reduce the potential for violence during police contacts involving people suffering from mental illness while simultaneously assessing the mental health services available to assist. This requires a commitment to problem solving, partnership, and supporting a coordinated effort from law enforcement, mental health services and the greater community of Los Angeles.¹

This is not a new challenge for law enforcement, one only needs to look at historical documents, such as the following Los Angeles Police Training Bulletin from 1948, which states, "An alert policeman anticipates the unpredictable thoughts and actions of a mentally ill person. He treats the patient with understanding and consideration, remembering, however, that the use of protective restraint is often necessary."²

The advent of de-institutionalization was codified in California by the Lanterman-Petris-Short Act in 1967, and by subsequent legislation across the nation. We, as a society, can no longer simply lock a chronically mentally ill
