through a combination of a rigorous discipline, a well-organized staff and the personal involvement of participating organizations. First, centrally administered, this model used drawings of its members' organizational structures to map the various existing programs, projects and efforts. This mapping allowed project leaders to see what they were doing and to coordinate their efforts. Second, through a personal tour, the project's progress was monitored and adjustments were made. Finally, the project's progress was reported to the project's steering committee, which was responsible for the project's overall direction and for the project's budget.

For instance, research on the increasing reliance of people on the Internet revealed that people who had used the Internet for more than 12 months had a higher level of self-efficacy than those who had used it for less than 12 months. In other words, the more people used the Internet, the more confident they became in their ability to use it. This finding has important implications for the design of online learning environments. For example, if a person has used the Internet for a long time, they are more likely to be successful in using it. Therefore, online learning environments should be designed to support people who have used the Internet for a long time. This can be done by providing them with more advanced features and more challenging content. In addition, online learning environments should be designed to support people who have used the Internet for a short time. This can be done by providing them with more basic features and more introductory content. By designing online learning environments to support people with different levels of Internet experience, we can help them to become more confident and successful in using the Internet.
