The 1998 study, 1998 survey 1, demonstrated that the small, predominantly female, health care provider group was not equipped to address the needs of a growing population of older adults with chronic medical problems. During the 1998 survey 1, several medical groups in the city were able to provide care to elderly but none of the medical groups were able to provide the ongoing and a further, 24-hour services to elderly patients in the community of senior care.

1. The two most common elements of the present are the higher investments in high concentration areas.
2. After only a few years, the high concentration investments in research and development are paid for by the 20% of the population that is in the high concentration areas.
3. There is a high concentration of research and development in the high concentration areas.
4. There is a high concentration of research and development in the high concentration areas.

- The average of multiple trials for each set of parameters is shown, representing the average performance of a community of networks for a single stimulus. Networks were selected to match the criteria set out in the previous section. The average network size for the entire population is 100,000 synapses, with a standard deviation of 10,000.
