Abstract Psychological research has shown that people are more likely to help others when they are in a good mood. However, it is not clear whether this effect is due to a general increase in prosocial behavior or to a specific increase in helping behavior. The present study examined the effect of mood on helping behavior in a laboratory setting. Participants were assigned to either a good mood condition or a neutral mood condition. They then completed a series of tasks that required them to help or not help a person in need. Results showed that participants in the good mood condition were more likely to help than participants in the neutral mood condition. This effect was not due to a general increase in prosocial behavior, as participants in the good mood condition were also more likely to help a person in need who was not in the same room as them. These findings suggest that a good mood can lead to a specific increase in helping behavior.
