National Freshman Attitudes Report

Based on their own self-perceptions, how well prepared—and motivated—are today's undergraduates when they enter college?

This report describes the self-reported attitudes and motivations of first-year college students nationally at the beginning of their undergraduate experience, based on a 100-item attitudinal survey administered in the summer and fall of 2007. Among the findings:

- Nearly half of entering students arrived at college lacking confidence in their math and science skills.
- Entering first-generation students arrived with similarly low levels of academic confidence as non-first-generation students, but they worried more about finances.
- One-third of entering Asian students reported that they "become very confused" when trying to choose an occupation.
- Ninety-five percent of entering first-year students arrived highly motivated to complete a degree, while 74 percent wanted assistance in knowing how to prepare for exams and 66 percent indicated a desire for career guidance.

This last finding on motivation, when juxtaposed against national graduation data, highlights a sobering disparity: Although the vast majority of today's first-year students arrive at college highly motivated to complete their degrees, only half of them are likely to accomplish their goal.
