labyrinthine streets and the hustle and bustle of the souq in Westerners minds but for the inhabitants of the Middle East it is a much more mercurial thing and one that s changing today faster than ever Here in ten urban stories set across the region the city reveals itself through a vibrant array of characters from the celebrated author collecting an award in the city that exiled him decades before to the forlorn lover waiting at a rendezvous as government officials raid nearby shops confiscating wanton Valentine s Day roses Whilst engineers race to complete another world s tallest building in Dubai and American helicopters patrol the Martyrs Bridge in Baghdad we realise it is the people and not the landmarks that define these places like the language student in Beirut who tries to make a joke of being war broken to her friends or the Israeli General who invites guests to his office to watch promo videos for the tank that will win the next war whilst eating biscuits and reciting poetry For all we think we know of the conflict and exoticism of the region nothing opens more doors to what we don t than its writing Here ten short stories by new and established writers have been selected and translated in English for the first time to open just such a door Isolation homesickness and sex are themes to be expected in literature about cities It is human for isolated people to experience places intensely and for the displaced to miss home The Times 22 Nov 08 The desert cities bloom with unsustainable desire The Independent 28 Nov 08 a sampler of the vibrant writing coming out of the Middle East The Saudi Gazette 5 Jan
