Endocrine System and Endocrine Regulation

Background

The endocrine system has specialized networks of glands, hormones and receptors. Together, the two components send distinct but sometimes shared messages and broadly influence the way organisms respond to their environment and behave.

Generally, all organisms have either one or two main systems controlling and coordinating the processes within the body:

1. The nervous system, which sends rapid point-to-point signals by means of electrical signals passing along the surface of specialized organs of tissues.
2. The endocrine system, which is a slower system based on chemical messengers (the hormones) which are released from the glands (or other specialized structures) into the body's fluid body.

The nervous system reacts to stimuli with the endocrine system to control all body functions and processes.

Now, identify the main function of the system from a range of the various systems and the name of the associated endocrine glands.
