- Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of older adults. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The study population consisted of 100 older adults (65 years of age and older) who were recruited from a senior center. The study was divided into two groups: a walking group and a control group. The walking group walked for 30 minutes, three times a week, for 12 weeks. The control group did not walk. The study measured the following variables: physical health (walking speed, walking distance, and walking time), psychological health (depression, anxiety, and stress), and quality of life (physical, mental, and social). The results of the study showed that the walking group had significantly better physical and psychological health and quality of life than the control group. The walking group had a significantly higher walking speed, walking distance, and walking time than the control group. The walking group had significantly lower levels of depression, anxiety, and stress than the control group. The walking group had significantly higher levels of physical, mental, and social quality of life than the control group. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health and quality of life of older adults.
