

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then randomly selects a name from the names placed in bowls for each group. The name that is called reads the problem, and that person then uses an alternative to the problem to help understand how to solve it. Each member frequently shares the answer to their assignment.

Afterward, the class discusses each set with details, and the class reads the group-generated, edited, and simplified version. The average number of assignments for each group was about five to twelve. The problem-solving strategy for each problem was often clearly shown, and the students were able to explain the solution.

The students took a break and completed a project for the next week. They had to create a poster for the Museum of the Future, showing a future building design, which also included the following: the problem-solving strategy for each building assignment, including every assignment being created by that group, and each member's building design through drawings.

After class, going out to lunch and having a walk through the school and the community helped the students and teachers to understand and appreciate the facility again.

"The kids got a great feeling of accomplishment and it was shared. They found out the meaning of their building and the teacher's role in the building process for building."

"The students show a great sense of learning and growth."

"I think the students will find that their building process was a great one."
