

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression among men and women who had been exposed to violence by intimate partners. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Women's Health are used to examine the prevalence of self-reported depression among women who have experienced physical or sexual violence by their current or former partner. Results indicate that women who reported experiencing physical or sexual violence by their current or former partner were more likely to report having experienced depression than those who did not experience such violence.
