Abstract

The Institute of Transportation Engineers (ITE) Trip Generation Handbook has been in common use since the 1970s to estimate vehicle trips generated by more than 172 land use categories as a function of establishment size. However, observed trip rates display a huge error range across different land use categories and urban contexts. Although contextual adjustment factors can ameliorate the error in the ITE trip generation estimates considerably, local site-specific trip generation rates should be collected for this purpose. Given the huge time and monetary costs of data collection, adjusting the ITE trip generation rate is mainly done in large metropolitan areas such as Portland, OR, Baltimore, MD, and San Francisco, CA, while it is ignored by many jurisdictions in small to medium-sized metropolitan areas. Here, the ITE trip generation rates for strip mall land use in Louisiana are adjusted by considering the extent to which the built environment characteristics can improve the accuracy of estimated vehicle trip generation rates in smaller urban areas. Vehicle trip data were collected for two consecutive days at 40 strip malls across eight different urban areas of Louisiana to develop whole day and afternoon peak hour contextual adjustment factors for the given land use category across the study area. The results of this study show noticeable improvement for whole day analysis compared with the ITE method by producing a 42% reduction in root mean square error.

The Institute of Transportation Engineers (ITE) is the main reference and industry standard for estimating vehicle trips generated by new developments across the U.S.A. (1, 2). Since the 1970s, the ITE Trip Generation Handbook has published vehicle trip generation rates and equations by collecting data across 172 land uses from more than 5,500 case studies. Although the land use categories have been refined and the number of observations in each land use category has been increased, it has resulted in no more accurate estimates of vehicle trip generation rates at individual locations. The main problem with current practice is that the ITE models are based on data that are up to 50 years old. The number of observations in some land use categories is very low (e.g., only four observations for strip mall land use) and therefore the fitted regression line is not a reliable representation of the data. The ITE method also estimates vehicle trips based on establishment size only and ignores the multi-modal share of generated trips in urban areas because the majority of data are collected in a limited range of
