

THE ENIGMA OF THE RETINA REFLEX

by Chris Dowden

Nearly 22 years have passed since Kodak produced their first Retina Reflex. Nevertheless, a large number of photographers still use Retina Reflex cameras regularly. These photographers like the top-quality photos produced by the Retina and don't see any reason to replace a good camera with a more recent and gadget-laden SLR which won't take any better pictures.

Kodak produced four models of the Retina Reflex camera in Germany. The first model was called the Retina Reflex, the second the Retina Reflex S, the third the Retina Reflex III and the fourth the Retina Reflex IV. Although this article deals with the care and servicing of the Retina Reflex III, it points out some of the features of the other Retina Reflex cameras as well.

The Retina Reflex was the least complex of the group. The Retina Reflex and the reflex models which followed it used a Compur 00-MKV shutter with an added mechanism to open the shutter blades for reflex viewing. All of the Retina Reflex cameras had built-in light meters as well.

In many respects, the Retina Reflex was a grown-up Retina IIIc; in fact the two cameras shared interchangeable front lens groups for 35mm and 90mm focal lengths.

There were two versions of the Retina Reflex; one version released the shutter and mirror at the same time; this depended upon the mirror and light-trap door moving out of the way before the shutter released. The second version used an interlock lever which held up the shutter release until the focal plane aperture was clear. The first version or "free running" camera was not imported into this country by Eastman Kodak. Some of those Retina Reflex cameras used Rodenstock optics. The U.S. version, however, used Schneider lenses, and the Rodenstock and Schneider lenses are not interchangeable.

In 1959 the Retina Reflex S was put on the market. The Reflex S was the first of the Retinas to have interchangeable lenses and Kodak produced a special bayonet mount for this purpose, Fig. 1. The Retina Reflex S also introduced a cross-coupled meter to the Retina line and may have pioneered the use of strings to provide that capability.

Like the S, the Retina Reflex III used the Retina bayonet mount for fully interchangeable lenses. The III introduced a meter that was not only cross coupled but also was visible in the viewfinder. The Reflex III also introduced the body-front release used on the Retina Reflex III and IV. Fig. 2 shows the Retina Reflex III and the S.

The final Retina Reflex was the model IV. Similar to the Reflex III, the IV deleted M sync and added shutter and diaphragm information to the viewfinder. It also used a new type of film counter. Previous Retinas used a subtractive counter which locked the film transport when frame #1 was reached; the camera operator had to
