Section: How Population Change in the

Twentieth Century Changed the World

Over the past century, the world's population has grown by more than 50 percent. This growth has been driven by a combination of factors, including improved medical care, increased food production, and a decline in infant mortality. As a result, the world's population is now over 7 billion people. This growth has led to a number of challenges, including increased demand for resources, environmental degradation, and a growing need for social and economic development. In this section, we will explore the factors that have led to this rapid population growth and the challenges it presents.
