Guy Kenmore s Wife and The Rose and the Lily The wind stirred the yellow curls on the drooping head and the moonlight touched them with fingers of light bringing out their glints of gold The great magnolia tree outside the window shook a gust of strong sweet perfume from the large white waxen flowers and the scent of June roses and lilacs came up from the old fashioned garden But the sweetness and beauty of the night seemed lost on little Irene for her grieved sobs only burst forth afresh when Faith had departed The girlish bosom heaved the tears rained through her fingers her smothered wail disturbed the harmony of the beautiful night Another step came along the hall a hand turned the door knob and a handsome old man came into the room Irene my pet my darling where are you hiding Come to papa he called glancing around the dimly lighted room With a scream of joy the little figure sprang down from its high perch in the window and ran precipitately into his arms Oh papa dear papa you are home again she exclaimed laughing and crying together and patting his grey whiskers with her loving white hands Yes but you aren t glad to see me one bit You re crying because I ve come home Shall I go back to the city eh he inquired softly pinching her cheek and looking at her with kind blue eyes full of love Irene hid her lovely face on his broad breast and sobbed aloud Why what ails my little girl he exclaimed Who s been teasing my pet Where are mamma and the girls With a fresh rain of tears Irene sobbed out All g gone to the b ball and would not let me g go after you d told them all I might papa The old man s genial face clouded over instantly with some intangible annoyance Why wouldn t they let you go he inquired Bertha said if I went she wouldn t replied Irene hushing her sobs and answering in a high pitched indignant young voice she said children had no business at a ball The idea of calling me a child I was sixteen yesterday Oh papa have you brought me a birthday present from the city she inquired eagerly forgetting for a moment her grievance Yes dear And so Bertha wouldn t let you go to the ball he said taking a seat and drawing her down upon his knee It was mamma too She took Bertha s part and said I shouldn t come out until the girls were married Two Miss Brookes were quite enough in the market at one time she said As if I wanted to marry any of their ridiculous beaux with their lisps and their eye glasses and their black coats I despise them cried Irene indignantly
