Kismetology English Edition:

We who Live Apart Joan Connor, 2000 In We Who Live Apart Joan Connor returns to the dark New England of her earlier collection and the wry characters who inhabit it a hunter who has spent too much time listening to the woods a ferryman whose emotional seclusion leads to a doomed longing for a summer girl a carnival diviner whose cards foretell her desertion a corpse who out of sheer meanness will not stay below ground Although childlessness divorce and alcoholism are recurrent motifs that underscore the estrangement of many characters the moods of the stories are rarely bleak Humor figures in often as do elements of the folktale and the supernatural Despite the stylistic variety in these stories there is a shared vision of isolation in which characters wittingly and unwittingly ensure their separateness and even come to treasure it As the narrator says in The Anecdote of the Island After a year of debate it conduces to this I watch you leave as you once watched me Our cars separate at the base of a hill You diminish to a speck in my rearview mirror When I look for you I stare into my own eyes looking for you And I begin to think that what you want is not love but the hope for love Its remoteness Its shadow self You linger in dark places Indeed many of these characters linger in dark places but without giving in to despair In October a recovering alcoholic surprises herself and begins to risk the beginnings of reconnection And in Women's Problems a character coping with the loss of her lover and then her mother manages to transmute loss to gain with the triumphant realization that she has become her mother and that indeed Worse things could happen For these characters their apartness is as often a choice as a consequence but the choice has a consequence When Bluebeard's wife escapes her murderous husband and her fairy tale narrative in Bluebeard's First Wife she finds that Ordinairiness sat upon her shoulders like a weather eroded gargoyle Whether these characters isolate themselves or find themselves isolated by nets of personal and communal history they move to wisdom rather than despondency Connor displays a keen ear for language and a mastery of prose rhythms and dialogue Her writing which is often lyrical in the best sense amply repays the effort of rereading and reflection and the variety of narrative techniques sustains the reader's interest
