¹ These authors have argued that a more effective approach to the control of drug production and distribution would be to target suppliers rather than consumers (e.g. see Gosselin and Smith 1990). However, while this is a laudable aim, it is not clear that such a strategy would be effective in reducing drug use. The authors note that the current approach to drug control is based on the assumption that drug use is a rational choice, and that individuals will only use drugs if the benefits outweigh the costs. However, this is not always the case, and individuals may use drugs for a variety of reasons, including social pressure, addiction, and mental health problems. Therefore, a more holistic approach to drug control is needed, one that addresses the social, psychological, and medical factors that influence drug use.
