Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 10-week, 12-session, group-based, self-help intervention on the self-efficacy and self-management skills of 100 low-income, African American, and Hispanic women with type 2 diabetes. The intervention was designed to help women understand the importance of self-management, learn how to monitor blood glucose levels, and develop strategies to manage their condition. The results showed that the intervention had a significant positive effect on self-efficacy and self-management skills. The authors discuss the implications of these findings for the development of self-help interventions for people with chronic conditions.
