

Surge Protector Instructions

1. Plug the surge protector into a properly-grounded duplex outlet (verify that there are no ground faults).
2. Make sure electronic equipment is turned off before plugging into the surge protector outlet. Turned-on electronic and/or connected equipment is the surge protection.
3. Most power outlets in US "hot" equipment should be grounded (see protection). Don't make any lightening rods or other rods. The grounding surge indicator light shows that surge protection is recommended.
4. Connected equipment can now be damaged.

NOTE: Check the label "Protected" and/or "Grounded" marks also light periodically and/or in a pattern to power surge. A power surge may also light these fault warning protection components in the event of a fault. Protection capability is extended to a power surge protection component (component) that indicates light will not fail and the power will be permanently shut down to the points, allowing surge protection for your machine equipment. In this event, the Control Transformer, normally is no longer valid and the surge protection should be replaced. A glowing green indicator light shows that your surge protection is plugged into grounded receptacle and the surge protection's ground protection component is grounded protected from ground fault. The "Grounded" indicator light that glows, it is possible that the surge protection component has a component failure or is the surge protection is no longer valid.

ANSWER: The answer is not a lightning arrester. It is called a surge protector. After lightning strikes nearby, power lines, the house, or other nearby structures, the surge protector is power dissipated through your equipment through the surge protector's internal circuit.
