

Some people considered an alternative policy recommendation (perhaps justified) as follows:

1. These children are given sufficient educational opportunities elsewhere.

By the early 1970s, and the question is, have these children a fair educational experience? The authorities argued for some further action because these children were doing relatively well in the schools, and that was what was important. It was not the fact that they were doing well in the schools, but that they were doing well in the schools. It was not the fact that they were doing well in the schools, but that they were doing well in the schools.

Example: "I have noticed that the children are doing well in the schools, and that is what is important. It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools."

2. Another possible question is about the children's health.

Authorities had the question of how to deal with the children's health. It was not the fact that they were doing well in the schools, but that they were doing well in the schools. It was not the fact that they were doing well in the schools, but that they were doing well in the schools.

Example: "I have noticed that the children are doing well in the schools, and that is what is important. It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools."

3. The children's poor health is responsible for their poor performance.

The question is, is the children's health responsible for their poor performance? It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools. It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools.

Example: "I have noticed that the children are doing well in the schools, and that is what is important. It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools."

4. These children are given the opportunity to attend other schools.

The question is, is the children's health responsible for their poor performance? It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools. It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools.

Example: "I have noticed that the children are doing well in the schools, and that is what is important. It is not the fact that they are doing well in the schools, but that they are doing well in the schools."
