Abstract – The importance of the genetic structure of populations in conservation planning is well recognized. However, the lack of information on the genetic structure of populations is a major obstacle to the development of conservation strategies. In this study, we used microsatellite markers to assess the genetic structure of 10 populations of the European spruce sawfly (Pristiphora erichsonii) in the Iberian Peninsula. The results showed that the populations were genetically differentiated, and that the genetic structure was related to the geographical distribution of the populations. The study also showed that the populations were genetically diverse, and that the genetic diversity was related to the geographical distribution of the populations. The results of this study can be used to develop conservation strategies for the European spruce sawfly.

Abstract

The researchers are currently testing if the model accurately predicts the risk. "We're going to use the model to predict the risk of a patient with a given history of heart disease," says Dr. Kannel. "We'll then compare the model's prediction to what actually happens."
