

INTRODUCTION TO EQUILIBRIUM - WORKSHEET

1. Sketch the following systems:

a. closed system

→ Substance is transfered into or out of the system and energy

b. dynamic equilibrium

→ Substance/energy transfer into/out of system when a disturbance is applied to it

c. dynamic equilibrium

→ State not, when first spontaneously coming to this state, is the previous state

2. Give an example of three types of equilibrium systems:

a. stability equilibrium: a ball with input that produces an opposite reaction example: ball on a flat top, a cliff

b. process equilibrium: input under conditions (input is a flow, not a state)

3. Consider a closed flask filled partly with water. Suppose after this liquid vapour system is considered an example of a system in equilibrium and write the equilibrium equation.

This is an example of an equilibrium because it is a closed system.
No change in time

4. Consider a closed flask containing a substance in two different states: gaseous sugar crystals at the bottom of the flask. Explain why the following system is considered an example of a system in equilibrium and write the equilibrium equation.

This is example of an equilibrium because it is a closed system, and no change in time. The two states are interacting, however, i.e., they are in contact in the homogeneous mixture, appear homogeneous that state.
Evaporation and condensation are still happening, the substance is just not in the state.

5. Some systems appear to be in equilibrium, but really they are not. Differentiate systems that are considered as "statically stable" systems. Statically stable systems are open systems under input of energy, and substance is equal to the input of energy continuously. For example: think of a battery that continuously produces. Parts are always moving and products are always being replenished. There is no transfer of matter or particles.

Sketch the following as equilibrium system: 100, static state 100, system, or system:

a. decomposition of water in electrolysis cell 100

b. chemical reaction in a flask that is open to air. The pressure is in equilibrium 100

c. The water level of Lake Ontario remains constant 100

d. A homogeneous mixture in the laboratory 100

e. The equilibrium of a chemical and thermally, input under time of
