social inequality - AnswerSociety does not treat people equally. Social stratification* is the division of society into a hierarchy of social groups who have unequal access to and control over rewards, education, money, and other "goods" that are valued socially. We learn that individuals "achieve" success through hard work. This leads us to ignore the power of social networks and social institutions like education and mass media that affect how likely people in certain social groups are to be successful. Success is not based solely on workers' achievements. Aspects of ourselves over which we have no control, such as age, race, ethnicity, and gender, also play a major role in our ability to achieve success. For example, in the U.S. a gender wage gap exists where women are paid 82.5 cents, on average, to every dollar men make.

Sociologists are interested not only in understanding social stratification, but also in how these systems maintain themselves. Often people are discriminated against because of characteristics they have no control over, such as race or gender. For instance, a 2003 study by the National Bureau of Economic Research researched the effects of discrimination on the basis of race. Researchers responded to real job ads in Boston and Chicago by sending out fictional resumes. The resumes were headed by names that would be culturally recognized as either White or African-American, such as Emily Walsh or Lakisha Washington. The researchers sent applications to a wide variety of jobs from cashier work to sales management. Researchers found that "job applicants with white names needed to send about 10 resumes to get one callback; those with African-American names needed to send around 15 resumes to get one callback." This rate of response corresponded with an additional eight years of job experience. This level of discrimination occur
