

the Longman English Dictionary (1995) defines the term as follows: 'the quality of being able to do something without the aid of a machine or tool'. The definition is based on the fact that the term is used to describe a person who is able to do something without the aid of a machine or tool. This is a very common definition of the term, and it is used in many contexts. However, it is important to note that the term is not always used in this way. For example, it can also be used to describe a person who is able to do something without the aid of a machine or tool, but who is not necessarily a professional. In this case, the term is used to describe a person who is able to do something without the aid of a machine or tool, but who is not necessarily a professional. From leaving their jobs for independent contractors and using their own computers (see "Contractors", previous page), they took it to the streets, meeting in big numbers. The subjects also included any possible ways to attract and maintain the subjects.

The authors of the above studies believe that the frequency of the word "computer" is an effect of the effect.
