

send and receive multiple messages to and from several correspondents.

This increases efficiency as well saves me considerable time and cost. Cell phones are not limited to the basic function of making calls, and with internet capabilities, cell phones can double up as mini computers. This allows me to instantly download information, catch up on the latest news, views, and movies, communicate with my friend through different social networks, send and receive important business information, and the best part about all this is I can do it anywhere at any time.

Life Without Cell Phones

Life would be significantly different without the presence of the cell phone. To begin with, people would not be able to deliver urgent messages promptly. The time taken to communicate would also be significantly increased since cell phones allow people to talk instantaneously. Without the cell phone, long distant communications would be complicated making it difficult to keep in constant touch with friends or relatives who may live far away. The coordination capabilities that cell phones facilitate would also be hampered and in instances such as rescue operations, the success rates would be significantly reduced.

People Without Cell Phones

Cell phones have undoubtedly made slaves of men. We are constantly forced to act on the information which we receive through our cell phones without breaks. Cell phones bring about a lot of pressure and cause unnecessary worries as a result of their immediacy. Real relationships have also suffered as a result of the pressure that mobile phones create since, in the present time, people are still obligated to deal with work issues even from their homes.

Before the invention of the mobile phone, people enjoyed some solitude while at home or on travel since then they did not have to tackle work or other emerging issues then. The mobility in which cell phones afford us has resulted in us losing touch with each other on the streets or at work where we are too engrossed with
