Integrating Advanced High-throughput Technologies to Improve Plant Resilience to Environmental Challenges Freddy Mora-Poblete,Sigfredo Fuentes,Parviz Heidari,2023-06-28 High throughput technologies are those that allow the generation of large scale data related to omic analysis such as genomics transcriptomics proteomics phenomics and metabolomics Currently the development and use of these technologies has gone hand in hand with the development of bioinformatics tools which have allowed the integration of omics based data to understand crucial knowledge about the molecular systems that underlie the various functions of the plants In recent years there has been a huge development in the field of high throughput biology which is attributed to an era of tech startups Genomics studies in plants for instance have benefited from advances in high throughput technologies such as high throughput genotyping which have allowed us to investigate the regulation and function of thousands of genes and genomic regions involved in a novel adaptation In fact with current high throughput technologies it is possible to recover substantial portions of the plant diversity which is a key input for genetic improvement programs food security and conservation programs The integration of multilevel biological data involving investigations at the molecular level in genomics transcriptomics proteomics and metabolomics among others have allowed more comprehensive studies which broadens the opportunities to clarify key molecular aspects involved in the physiological responses to abiotic stresses
