10. Although this finding is consistent with the effect of increasing lower socioeconomic status on test scores, the present study is limited by the nature of the statistical approach. First, it is impossible to control for all factors that may be associated with the study's outcome. For example, parents of children in the lowest socioeconomic status may be different from those in higher socioeconomic status in ways that could affect the outcome. Second, the study is limited by the nature of the data. The data are cross-sectional, and therefore, it is not possible to determine whether the relationship between socioeconomic status and test scores is causal. Finally, the study is limited by the nature of the sample. The sample is not representative of the general population of children in the United States.
