

Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance

The Great Migration was a time period starting around 1900 and involved millions of African Americans leaving southern states (EX: Alabama, Texas, Virginia, etc.) and moving to cities in the midwest (EX: Detroit, Michigan, and St. Louis, Missouri) and cities in the northeast (New York City, New York and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania). Black Americans did this in order to escape the racism of the south and find better opportunities in the north.

After the 13th Amendment freed all the slaves in 1865, most of the now free black Americans stayed in the south. This was because the south was where their families still lived and they also had no money to travel. This was a problem because after slavery ended southern states started making state laws known as Jim Crow Laws to segregate (separate) blacks and whites in the south. These laws involved separate schools, water fountains, and parks for blacks and whites with the resources for black Americans always being worse. Jobs were also rare and low paying for blacks. Unsurprisingly black Americans in the south were unhappy because even though they were free they were not treated as equals.

The Great Migration started around 1900. Due to transportation like railroads and automobiles becoming cheaper millions of African American families started leaving southern states. Usually the father would go up ahead of his family first in order to find a better job and a place to live, then send for the rest of his family. These black families moved to major cities because there were usually established black communities in these areas. For example, the Harlem neighborhood of New York City was full of successful and famous African American business people and artists.

As more southern blacks moved into Harlem, New York City they began to work and communicate with the black Americans that had lived in Harlem all their lives. Southern African Americans brought their southern culture and history of slavery and combined it with the art and city culture already found in Harlem. Through these different, but shared black cultures, new music, art, and writing was produced that came to define and express black culture in the U.S. This explosion of new black culture was known as the Harlem Renaissance and soon spread to the rest of the country inspiring black Americans everywhere to express themselves. This new appreciation of black art, music, and writing would go on to have a large impact on creation of a type of music known as jazz.

1) During the Great Migration, where were African Americans LEAVING?

2) During the Great Migration, where were African Americans GOING TO?

3) Why did many African American families not leave the south when slavery first ended?

4) Beside Jim Crow Laws, what other problems did blacks face in the south?

5) What changed that allowed African Americans travel more?

6) Why did African Americans usually move to northern cities?

7) What part of New York City did many black families move to?

8) How were African Americans from the south different from African Americans from the north?

9) What is the Harlem Renaissance?
