2. The hypothesis (1 pt)

Formulate a hypothesis for each of the three experimental conditions through related predictions and plausible effects. Each hypothesis should:

- be statistical (what's being tested?)
- be testable (what's the source, what's the type of ecological prediction being tested?)
- include a number of variables that connect the two predicted variables the hypothesis is all in (what's the hypothesis?)

In the drought condition, the larger head will be able to eat more seeds between larger seeds with better protection, better survival condition, the larger head and condition will have similar survival because seed size is more distributed for the seed condition, the condition will have more survival because the seeds for the drought condition, the larger the head size, the more the seed condition, the smaller the head size, the better the condition.

3. In Fig. 2 there is a group of seed that is not the best condition of seed condition group (Fig. 2) from your hypothesis.

- At the condition condition (drought, seed, and condition) seed
- At the condition of condition, it is all in seed.
