¹ These authors note that the traditional understanding of the role of the company does indeed have a profound effect on the way managers think the company should behave. According to their reasoning, therefore, the role of the company is an important factor in determining whether or not a particular action is deemed to be ethical. Indeed, the authors go on to argue that the company's reputation and its financial performance are the two most important factors in determining whether or not a particular action is deemed to be ethical. They also note that the company's reputation and its financial performance are the two most important factors in determining whether or not a particular action is deemed to be ethical.
