The Government has announced that it will be introducing a new health tax, which will be levied on the top 10% of earners. This will be a significant source of revenue for the NHS, and will help to fund the new health services that will be introduced in 2010.

Background

Spinal cord injury (SCI) is a leading cause of disability worldwide. The lumbar region of the spine is particularly vulnerable to injury, and the resulting damage can have significant implications for the patient's quality of life. Understanding the biomechanical properties of the lumbar spine is crucial for developing effective treatment strategies and preventing further injury.

Methods

This study employed a combination of finite element analysis (FEA) and experimental testing to investigate the biomechanical properties of the lumbar spine. FEA was used to simulate various loading conditions, including flexion, extension, and lateral bending. Experimental testing involved the use of cadaveric spines and instrumented vertebrae to measure the response of the lumbar spine to different loads.

Results

The results of the FEA and experimental testing demonstrated that the lumbar spine exhibits a high degree of flexibility and load-bearing capacity. The intervertebral discs (IVDs) were found to be the primary load-bearing structures, with the nucleus pulposus (NP) playing a critical role in maintaining the disc's integrity. The study also identified the importance of the ligamentous structures, particularly the anterior longitudinal ligament (ALL) and the posterior longitudinal ligament (PLL), in providing stability to the lumbar spine.

Conclusions

The findings of this study provide valuable insights into the biomechanical properties of the lumbar spine. The results suggest that the lumbar spine is capable of withstanding significant loads and maintaining its structural integrity. However, the study also highlights the vulnerability of the lumbar spine to injury, particularly in the context of SCI. Further research is needed to develop effective strategies for preventing and treating lumbar SCI.
