

2.1.1 Levels of Ecology

Ecology encompasses all the living and nonliving things around us. The study of ecology focuses on the interactions between and among these living things, their environment and the environment in affecting them. The problems of environmentalists disappear from their minds once they know levels of ecology. Should they feel something about "environmental teaching material"? How can students obtain maximum information about where their highest activities lie?

When ecologists examine the interactions between organisms and their surroundings, they consider organisms as environmental disciplines. From environmentalists, they can predict the behavior of the organisms within their environment. Biological control (such as death) may affect the relationship between living things and the world in affecting them.

Ecological Levels of Organization

The ecological organization known as the Earth is a large, complex system with interacting and conflicting things. They can include things that different organisms, both living and nonliving, are involved in.
