Endocrine System and Endocrine Regulation

Background

The endocrine system has regulatory networks of glands, hormones and receptors. Together, the two components and interact with external physical surroundings and biologically-mediated or psychological responses, maintaining equilibrium and balance.

Basically, all endocrine glands release hormones, therefore, the entire system controlling and coordinating the processes within the body.

1. The endocrine system, which consists of glands that secrete hormones, is divided into two main groups: the endocrine system, which is composed of glands that secrete hormones, and the exocrine system, which is composed of glands that secrete substances that are not hormones.
2. The endocrine system, which is composed of glands that secrete hormones, is divided into two main groups: the endocrine system, which is composed of glands that secrete hormones, and the exocrine system, which is composed of glands that secrete substances that are not hormones.

The endocrine system works in conjunction with the nervous system to control all body functions and processes.

Four major endocrine glands are the thyroid, the pituitary, the adrenal, and the hypothalamus. These glands are the main source of the hormones that control the body.
