OECD Annual Report 2009 OECD, 2009-08-31 The OECD has faced many challenges in the last 50 years but perhaps none as great as the current global crisis Response to the crisis has been swift and massive But despite some cautious optimism the immediate future does not offer much relief The global economic system must undergo many structural changes if we are to avoid a repetition of this scenario The job ahead is substantial and requires great perseverance This is a key feature of the OECD which has consistently worked with governments with a long term view to address structural problems through enhanced global co operation The crisis has left virtually no area of policy making untouched It has brought many long simmering issues such as tax evasion income inequality good governance and competition issues back to the centre stage But other substantive medium and long term matters such as climate change and poverty reduction which were at the forefront of most government agendas only one year ago are adding to the sense of urgency This crisis presents opportunities as well as challenges and the OECD is seizing these opportunities to formulate policies that will lead to a stronger cleaner fairer world economy Over the past year the OECD has pressed for a stronger world economy through its work in areas such as regulation governance trade especially Doha investment and competition and of course developing policies for sustainable growth Work on anticorruption corporate governance and tax evasion has sought to restore trust in globalisation by making it cleaner So has literally our work on environment and climate change another face of cleaner Finally our work on employment and social inclusion education health care and economic development is key to developing a fairer more
