BIOL 4997: Biomedical Techniques
Paola G. Caballero León

Society has a strong influence on most of our daily decisions. What we eat, wear, and buy has been pre-established by trends. These trends unconsciously dictate our path, show us what is cool or not, what is right and what is not. You just have to ask little kids what they want to be when they grow up to confirm this. The kids' dream job list could go as follows: musician, actor, dancer, astronaut, firefighter, doctor, and it could go on and on. The first three jobs mentioned have one quality in common: fame. Astronauts go to space and what little kid is not enthralled by the unknown universe? With movies such as Star Wars and Star Trek, the universe has become a place of much interest. Lastly, firefighters and doctors save lives. Rare is the occasion when a little kid says he or she wants to be a scientist. In order for a little kid to say that, he or she needs to have a previous idea of what a scientist is and does. Sadly, society is too focused on promoting fame, the necessity to improve health conditions and other types of careers as the "successful" ones. I am a product of this type of society. I grew up with the idea of becoming a doctor and had established a plan to achieve this goal. It was not until I started my first year at college and in the RISE program that I discovered what research truly was. Never had I considered before doing research as my ultimate career goal...until now.

During this Spring Semester 2014, I enrolled in the Biomedical Techniques course of the RISE Program. It was a very intensive course in which I learned about various laboratory techniques that enhanced my performance in the various research experiences throughout the semester. Each week, we met up with different mentors that were in charge of research groups inside the university. They taught us valuable techniques commonly applied in their research projects. This part served as preliminary training for the research projects we would have to carry out after that. Some techniques that I learned and practiced were: protein separation with SDS-Page, analysis of protein activity with Zymography electrophoresis, DNA Barcoding, sterile techniques, water quality analysis with coliphages, among many others.

One of the research projects I carried out with my lab partner was isolating and characterizing a mycobacteriophage from tropical soils of Puerto Rico. The workshop we received motivated us a lot and soon after it we began to work with the project. The hardest and most frustrating part was bringing soil samples week after week and, after spending an average of three days analyzing the sample, getting negative results. We
