3 Results and discussion

First of all, we checked that the results from the algorithm with a small number of large time steps, eq. 11 give practically the same results than that with many small steps, eq. 10, thus confirming the efficiency of the former. This was evident in all cases simulated, as shown for example in Figure 2.

In order to evaluate the accuracy of the results for the prediction of sedimentation profiles in the velocity mode, we have compared them with calculations with the well-known SEDFIT software (Schuck, 2000). This tool, which includes a sophisticated Lamm-equation solver has an utility for predicting the concentration profiles. Comparison of our simulated profiles with the SEDFIT predictions resulted in a good agreement, as shown in Figure 2. The determination of concentration profiles has the final purpose of determining the molecular parameters of interest, so the most relevant evaluation of their prediction is the confirmation of whether their analysis provides correct values for those parameters. In order to do so with our simulation results, we employed the analysis tool of SEDFIT as an independent and robust criterion. Indeed, SEDFIT uses a reliable Lamm-equation solver to determine the parameters by means of powerful optimization algorithms. In the single-species mode of SEDFIT, the program provides the values of the molecular weight, M , and
