The system is designed to estimate a person's self-reported A1C levels and the need for insulin. It estimates the value for any other glucose reading. "You could imagine this being the first step toward a more personal, more individualized approach to A1C testing," he says. "It's almost like, 'You have certain facts about your body, so let's estimate it.' Other than that, it's really just the math." The built-in algorithm actually feeds into an insulin flow time algorithm, designed to "simulate the effects of an insulin pump using the value you've entered in a blood test," he says.
