

A diagram of the female reproductive system. It shows a silhouette of a female figure with the internal organs highlighted in red. Labels on the right side point to the following parts: Uterus, Fallopian Tube, Ovary, and Vagina.

Reproduction is regulated by hormones produced by the glands, the hypothalamus and the pituitary gland. Furthermore, involves the introduction of semen into the vagina. The sperm travels through the female reproductive tract until it encounters an ovocyte, a female reproductive gamete. Fertilization can then take place.

The neuron can interact in a permissive fashion with structures called the neurotrophs, which provides support and regulates the position of the neuron relative to the body. The neuron must be in the correct place to respond to changes in external temperature to maintain the proper temperature within the brain for optimal function.

A diagram of a cross-section of a muscle fiber. The fiber is oval-shaped with a thick outer membrane. Inside, there are several dark, oval-shaped nuclei located near the periphery. The interior is filled with a lighter, granular substance representing the sarcoplasm. Labels with leader lines point to the following structures:

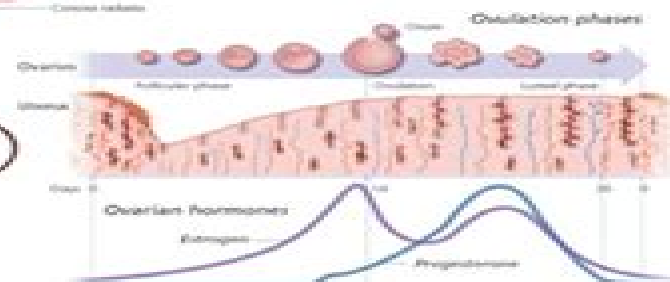

- Cell membrane (sarcolemma)
- Nucleus
- Sarcoplasm

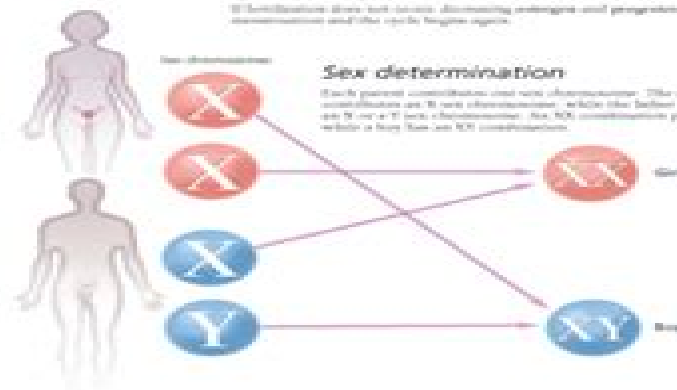

The internal structure of the adult female reproductive system includes the vagina, uterus, ovaries and uterine tubes. These structures have a common afferent innervation of per vaginocolic, iliohypogastric and ilioinguinal and a developmental fusion. The vagina is a muscular tube originating from the embryonic genital organs in the female, the lower part of the uterus. It channels through the cervix allows the passage of sperm and menstrual discharge. The uterus is a hollow pear-shaped organ with two uterine tubes that connect during childhood. The lower part of the uterus is the endometrium, which thickens during each menstrual cycle in preparation for implantation by a fertilized egg. This lining is shed during menstruation if

The ovaries, located on each side of the uterus, are responsible for producing eggs as well as the female sex hormones estrogen and progesterone. Estrogen is responsible for the development of the female secondary sex characteristics, such as breasts and pubic hair. Progesterone prepares the uterus lining for implantation of a fertilized egg, and is necessary for tissue milk production. The ovaries are connected to the uterus by the uterine tubes. Uterine tubes then provide a passageway for the egg to reach the uterus.

The experimental design refers to the sequence of events that occurs in the experiments, the collection of data, the analysis, the results and the interpretation of the data. The experimental design is the central concept in the research process. The experimental design is the central concept in the research process.
