

Inter-process Communication

A process can be of two types:

- Independent process
- Co-operating process

An independent process is not affected by the execution of other processes while a co-operating process can be affected by other executing processes. Though one can think that those processes, which are running independently, will execute very efficiently, in reality, there are many situations when co-operative nature can be utilized for increasing computational speed, convenience, and modularity.

Inter Process Communication

Inter-process communication is used for exchanging useful information between numerous threads in one or more processes (or programs). Inter-process communication (IPC) is a mechanism that allows processes to communicate with each other and synchronize their actions. The communication between these processes can be seen as a method of co-operation between them. The Processes may be running on single or multiple computers connected by a network.

IPC helps achieve these things:

Computational Speedup

Modularity

Information and data sharing

Privilege separation

Processes can communicate with each other and synchronize their actions.

Approaches for Inter Process Communication

Pipes

It is a half-duplex method (or one-way communication) used for IPC between two related processes. It is like a scenario like filling the water with a tap into a bucket. The filling process is writing into the pipe and the reading process is retrieved from the pipe.
