As a result, you can use the same code to create a new document, add a new page, and save the document. The following code snippet shows how to create a new document, add a new page, and save the document. The code is written in C# and uses the `System.IO` namespace to create and save files.

using System.IO;

// Create a new document
Document doc = new Document();

doc.Pages.Add(page);

// Save the document

The code above creates a new document, adds a new page, and saves the document to a file named `document.pdf`. The `Document` class is a base class for the `Page` class, and the `Page` class is a base class for the `PageContent` class. The `PageContent` class is a base class for the `PageContentElement` class, which is a base class for the `PageContentElementBase` class. The `PageContentElementBase` class is a base class for the `PageContentElementBase` class, which is a base class for the `PageContentElementBase` class.

The code above is a simplified version of the code that would be used to create a new document, add a new page, and save the document. The code is written in C# and uses the `System.IO` namespace to create and save files.
